Most of us use an external drive, whether it's an external hard drive, USB thumb drive, or something else, to store all of our music, videos, and other files. If you're running out of room on your internal hard drive, or if you simply want to free up space for more files, you might want to consider uninstalling some apps and games. This way, you can store them on an external drive or USB thumb drive while you have them on your internal hard drive. Windows 7 has a built-in tool to find out exactly how much space each application is taking up, and it's pretty easy to use. Here are a few ways to free up space on your computer. Consider removing installed programs If you're running low on space on your computer, consider using Windows 7's built-in Disk Cleanup utility to remove unused applications. Click the Start menu, and select All Programs > Accessories > System Tools > Disk Cleanup. If you're running low on space, you can also use Disk Cleanup to clean up temporary files, such as the files on your desktop or desktop shortcuts, to free up space. Check for software conflicts If you're having issues with your computer's performance, here are a few tools that can help you diagnose software conflicts on your computer. Many newer applications and games are designed to function better with the SSE2 instruction set. If your computer is not equipped with SSE2, you might consider downloading the latest version of the program. Googling "How do I uninstall an app that won't uninstall?" is likely to bring you to a number of articles explaining how to uninstall your apps.

The Supreme Court (SC) on Monday sought response from the Centre on a plea seeking the lifting of the stay on the Aadhaar verdict. A constitution bench comprising justices J Chelameswar, Ranjan Gogoi and M B Lokur will examine the petitioner's arguments. "This court does not have the capacity to review the decision of the 9 judges of this court. This court has jurisdiction to review the decision of five judges. There is a question whether the decision can be overturned by only five judges and not nine. The SC will decide on the question," the bench said. Government lawyer Rakesh Dwivedi said a common man cannot face the consequences of Aadhaar being made mandatory for any and all activities in the country. "With the extensive debate that took place in the Aadhaar case, it seems that there is no party that has not been affected by this. It is a landmark decision that has involved all sections of the society. From common man to corporate honcham, everyone needs Aadhaar to open up new opportunities," Dwivedi said. "We are hopeful that the bench will clear the issue very soon as the issue is making headlines in the media every other day," he said. Attorney General K K Venugopal had filed an affidavit stating that the Aadhaar Act was not passed by Parliament and thus the apex court cannot rule on whether such a thing is valid. The petition had challenged the verdict of the Constitution Bench holding that Section 7(3) of the Aadhaar Act, which makes it mandatory for any entity to make Aadhaar numbers a condition for any financial transaction, cannot be struck down. The move comes after the U.S. government had requested to kill the deal, known as a69d392a70
