An experiment to study the efficacy of herbicide treatment has been conducted by placing a known number of plants of a standard test species, Paspalum dilatatum, in two groups (cloned or planted). Plants in one of the groups were treated with a herbicide according to a conventional split-plot design, with time of treatment in the main plot and plant position within the plot (in rows) in the subplot. The incidence and severity of visible disease symptoms were measured and the presence and relative abundance of a second species, Panicum maximum, determined in both treated and untreated groups. Both the presence of a second species and the management of time of herbicide treatment significantly affected the effectiveness of herbicide treatment. The effects of these factors on the presence and relative abundance of P. maximum were similar to those observed in a similar study with uncloned
